We see nothing to justify any but low figures for the wool in the future, and i it will lead to a loss to the investors. If, however, buyers are willing to place, and keep the value of wool on its legitimate basis, as compared with the goods made from it, they can operate with safety and realize a fair compension for handling the wool; and here it may also be well to allude to another consideration which comes into view, and this is the general tendency toward the equalization in values of all the great staples the world over. Take, for instance, cotton, raw and manufactured grain, flour, pork, lard, beef, hides, leather, fruits, wines, iron, everything which the earth yields, is affected and modified, directly or indirectly, by the market values elsewhere, the matter of transportation being the

is affected and modified, directly or indirectly, by the market values elsewhere, the matter of transportation being the principal difference. Thus we are at the principal difference. Thus we are at the present time exporting every important agricultural product except wool to Europe and other countries, and our country is, particularly in the West, thriving and growing rich under this wholesomeregime.

Now, it is clear that we can compete with other countries in everything except wool; can we not, and must see not, compete with them in that? This is an important question, which possibly must be met in the not very distant future. Wool growers in Australia become millionaires at 7d. to 8d. (16c.) per lb. for wool that for staple and fineness is unsurpassed. It remains to be proven whether we can, in Texas or California or Tennessee, produce as cheap and good a raw material. If not, we must, sconer or later, cease to grow it, and do as England does, and successfully, we must breed and raise such sheep as yield good mutton as well as good wool, and so far as all the thickly populated States are concerned, the farmer must look to the shambles as well as to the mills for his remuneration.
